ROHAN RAO SPEECH TO TEXT

Hello, my name is Rohan Rao, and today I will be sharing my views on the original MyGov podcast website, as well as the website Ananya and her teammates have made for their UI/UX project. Okay, so my task is to find a podcast about women's achievements or women entrepreneurs and figure out how to listen to it. The original homepage feels confusing. I am scrolling a lot, but there is no clear way to find relevant episodes. I wish there were proper categories and filters. Okay, so I found an episode, but, like, where's the play button? I expected it to play directly. I mean, what is this? The navigation is unclear, and there is not enough information to help me choose an episode. Honestly, finding something to listen to feels like a whole side quest. Better search, topic filters, and an accessible player would help a lot. Now let's try the redesigned version. Okay, so the search bar is easy to find, and browsing by topic is much better. I found an episode, and the play button actually works. That's good. The player stays at the bottom while I browse, and I can save episodes too. Now that is much more convenient, but it still needs some work. Some titles are too long, and short episode summaries would help me decide what to listen to. Search results could be easier to scan. The library needs better options for removing existing saved episodes. The player could also feel less cluttered, especially on my phone. It just looks a little bit off. Overall, the redesign is definitely better than the original, but it's not perfect yet. I'd suggest improving the search results, adding summaries wherever information is available, making library management easier, and polishing the mobile layout. The redesign fixes several major issues, but there is still room to make it smoother and much more user-friendly. Thanks.